Safer Facebooking

Your Profile: Careful of What You Write Recently, employers have looked up applicants on Facebook in order to get a better picture of the person they may be interested in hiring. Make your profile private so that only people you choose will be able to see it.

Keep Private Information Private Some people trust others and websites too much, and forget that millions of people can look at the private information they post; this includes criminals looking for their next victim. Someone who steals your identity can do devastating things, such as ruin your credit and even commit crimes under your name.

Strangers are Still Strangers When you meet someone for the first time offline, you may have a difficult time knowing if the person really is who he or she claims to be. The online world is no different. The online world is ideal for people who enjoy over exaggerating their life, or making up a completely different one from their own.

Beware of Teenage Predators Teen predators have taken over teen chat rooms and social networking sites like Facebook. These adults will search sites for unsuspecting teenagers, and pose as teenagers themselves. They will get to know them, and then eventually try to meet him or her offline.

Downloading Computer Viruses from Facebook Approximately 83 percent of people who use social networking sites download files from other people's profiles. Since these files are usually coming from unknown individuals, some of them contain viruses that either corrupt your computer, or attempt to collect personal information that can be used against you.

Increases Internet Addiction Social networking sites are fun and addictive. Meeting new people, catching up with old friends, and visiting interesting profiles can take up hours each day. When Facebook begins to interfere with your life, you may be developing an Internet addiction.

Facebook risks are not a reason for you to stop using the social networking site, because it can be beneficial to you. You can use it as a portfolio for work or school, and use it recreationally. You just need to be careful how you use it and how much information you post and take from it. Just like the offline world, don't trust everyone and look out for suspicious people.
